Note to Researchers

Most of the microfilm in this publication was reproduced from microfilm held at the U.S. Army Center of Military History. Because of the condition of the original manuscripts during the filming and the film-processing techniques used on the microfilm, not every reel has reproduced to a consistent standard; hence, some of the images are illegible. However, every effort has been made to reproduce the best image possible.

Descriptions of the titles in this collection contain the following information, where available: title, CMH call number, author, date, page count, type of document, and format. Brief content descriptions or chapter breakdowns are included in order to provide an idea of the subjects.

Introduction

The Korean War began at 4:00 in the morning, 25 June 1950, when elements of the North Korean People's Army crossed the 38th Parallel and invaded South Korea. Within days, the United Nations had condemned the aggression and authorized the use of force to resist the invasion. President Harry Truman named General Douglas MacArthur to command U.S. military units sent to Korea. At the request of the United Nations, MacArthur also became commander in chief of all UN forces in Korea.

At the time of the North Korean invasion, the only U.S. Army units in the area were four understrength divisions engaged in occupation duties in Japan. Advanced elements of the 24th Infantry Division, under Major General William Dean, arrived in Korea on 2 July 1950. The next day a small task force, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Charles B. Smith, made contact with the advancing North Korean Army. In this first engagement between U.S. forces and the North Koreans, Task Force Smith was badly outnumbered and outgunned. The North Korean force, which included more than thirty tanks, quickly pushed aside the small American force and continued its advance.

Throughout the month of July, Republic of Korea units, along with the U.S. Army 24th and 25th Divisions, conducted a fighting withdrawal down the Korean peninsula. As additional U.S. Army units entered the fight, resistance stiffened, until a stalemate was reached in a defensive perimeter surrounding the South Korean port city of Pusan. For most of August and into September, the beleaguered defenders repulsed repeated attacks on their positions. However, as U.S. reinforcements, as well as military contingents from twenty other nations began to pour into Pusan, the tide began to turn.

At dawn on September 15, elements of the 1st Marine Division and the U.S. Army 7th Division began the amphibious assault on the port of Inchon, deep in the enemy's rear. This unexpected strike, coupled with the breakout of Eighth Army forces in the Pusan perimeter, broke the back of the North Korean offensive. Within days, the North Korean Army was in headlong retreat. UN forces began a pursuit that carried them across the 38th Parallel and north toward the Yalu River and the Manchurian border.

In November the war entered a new phase as Communist Chinese units counterattacked the advancing UN forces. On 25 November a major attack against X Corps elements (1st Marine Division and 7th Infantry Division) near the Chosin Reservoir halted their advance and forced a general retreat across the front. The war moved south again as UN forces struggled to secure defensible terrain and regain the initiative.

On 11 April 1951, President Truman relieved General MacArthur from command of the UN forces. MacArthur was replaced by General Matthew Ridgway, who was moved up from his position as Eighth Army commander. Lieutenant General James Van Fleet assumed command of the Eighth Army. Together, Ridgway and Van Fleet orchestrated a series of limited attacks designed to utilize the fire-power advantage that the UN units possessed and to inflict maximum casualties on Communist forces.

For the next two years UN and Communist forces dueled back and forth across the central portion of the Korean peninsula. Neither side gained a clear advantage, and the war became an artillery-dominated trench stalemate that greatly resembled World War I battles on the western front. American soldiers and Marines attached colorful names to the yards of rock and rubble they contested with the Communists. Bloody Ridge, Old Baldy, The Punchbowl, and Pork Chop Hill entered the lexicon of American military history.

Faced with a stalemate, Communist and UN representatives began negotiations on 10 July 1951. Peace talks continued, off and on, for the next two years as both sides jockeyed for a military or diplomatic advantage. Finally, on 27 July 1953, the armistice was signed, and a grim cease-fire ensued across the front. The war was over.

All told, 33,629 American servicemen died in Korea, and an additional 103,284 were wounded. Approximately 3,000 servicemen from UN forces also died in the conflict.¹ Estimates on Korean and

Chinese casualties vary widely but may have approached 200,000 South Korean, 520,000 North Korean, and 900,000 Chinese killed or wounded during the war.²

Scope and Content

This collection of microfilm, devoted to the operations of the U.S. Army during the Korean War, is drawn from the files of the U.S. Army Center of Military History. It consists of materials created and collected by Army historians in support of the publication of volumes in the series U.S. Army in the Korean War, and to support numerous scholars working on that important period.

The editors have organized the bulk of the collection chronologically by year, and then by functional area (Engineers, Signal, Transportation, etc.). The remaining documents include studies extracted from the Far East Command, Military History Section, History of the Korean War, followed by a small group of miscellaneous studies that did not fit neatly into any other category.

Shortly after the war began, the U.S. Army began the activation and development of eight historical detachments to prepare and collect historical materials throughout the theater. It conducted after-action interviews with soldiers of all ranks and prepared historical manuscripts documenting Army activities throughout the war. Three teams, the 4th, 6th, and 7th were attached to I Corps. Two others, the 5th and 8th, worked with X Corps. The 2d and 3d Historical Detachments operated at large, under the control of the 1st Detachment, which served as an administrative headquarters for the other seven. U.S. Army combat historians assigned to the detachments included such familiar names as Martin Blumenson and Bevin Alexander.

On 24 January 1953, the eight Military History Detachments were inactivated and replaced by the 8086 Army Unit. Personnel and duties remained unchanged, but now seven historical teams all worked directly underneath one detachment headquarters. Throughout the war, personnel from the Eighth Army Military History Section and the Far East Command Military History Section also produced studies on selected topics of interest to those commands. At the end of the war, these studies were forwarded to the Office of the Chief of Military History to serve as the basis for the official history of the U.S. Army in Korea.

Approximately 50 percent of the materials in this collection consists of combat operations after-action reports and interviews prepared by the Eighth Army Military History Section and by the Military History Detachments attached throughout the theater. They include operations plans, interviews, after-action reports, maps, sketches, and photographs pertaining to specific company, battalion, and regimental operations between July 1950 and April 1953. These reports offer a detailed look at small-unit combat in Korea, and are unmatched by any other collections of primary source material.

Most of the remaining documents also were prepared by the historians of the Military History Detachments and describe activities of combat support and combat service support units throughout the war. Some consist of after-action reports from specific support operations, while other documents present historical analysis on a theme or organization across a broader time span. The extracts from the Far East Command's History of the Korean War highlight administrative issues that perplexed the staff throughout the war. Although these documents are by no means comprehensive, they do provide thoughtful analysis of many issues critical to the Army during the Korean War.

This analysis also sets this collection apart from other collections of Korean War records. The collection of official unit records maintained by the Suitland Reference Branch of the National Archives is much larger and in some cases more detailed. However, those records lack the insight and interpretation provided by the Army historians who observed the events. This collection neatly fills a gap between the unfiltered official records and the wide range of personal reminiscences currently available.

The U.S. Army Center of Military History is pleased to cooperate with Scholarly Resources to make this valuable collection available to a wide range of researchers. One of the Center's primary missions is to encourage the study and use of military history. We hope that the increased availability of this collection will stimulate public interest in the history of the U.S. Army during the Korean War period, much as the release of World War II collections promoted interest in that conflict during the fiftieth anniversary commemorations of its major events.
