Alger Hiss, the State Department, and Creation of the United Nations Organization, 1940-1946

In March 1933 Alger Hiss was working for the New York law firm, Cotton, Franklin, Wright & Gordon when he received a telegram from his Harvard Law School mentor Felix Frankfurter encouraging him to pursue a career in public service as an attorney for the New Deal’s Agricultural Adjustment Administration (AAA). The AAA had been established in response to the agricultural crisis that many believed was a major cause of the Great Depression. It was at the center of the New Deal’s strategy for economic recovery that looked to raise prices by cutting production in order to increase farm income and put the brakes on the deflationary spiral that most economists believed had driven the United States into depression. At the AAA Hiss worked alongside people like Chester Davis (agency head), Telford Taylor, Adlai Stevenson, Thurmond Arnold, and Abe Fortas in an agency that was often divided along political lines. Hiss was associated with the left-liberal faction in the AAA that included Jerome Frank, Nathan Witt, John Abt, and Lee Pressman. These young lawyers were concerned that the agency was ignoring the problem of hunger and the plight of sharecroppers and tenant farmers, who were being thrown off the land, as the federal government’s price support policy was paying to remove land from production.

In July 1934, at a time when southern cotton growers and politicians were pushing the AAA in a conservative direction, Hiss took a leave of absence from the agency and accepted a position as temporary legal assistant to the Senate Special Committee on Investigation of the Munitions Industry, chaired by Senator Gerald Nye. Though he was not looking for another New Deal job, Hiss frustrated by the politics and in fighting at the AAA, was enticed by the opportunity to work with the Nye Committee that was conducting very the high profile “merchant of death” hearings about military profiteering during the First World War. Many in the peace movement supported the Nye Committee’s agenda that sought to expose the corrupt relationship between munitions makers, primarily the DuPont Company, and the military establishment. The horrors of World War I had created widespread isolationist sentiment in America, but when Gerald Nye seemed to be unwilling to acknowledge the growing threat presented by the rise of Nazism and made a series of statements that some believed bordered on anti-Semitism, Hiss began to question Nye’s position and resigned from the Committee in August 1935.

He then joined the staff of the United States Solicitor General, in part to work on defending the Agricultural Adjustment Act whose constitutionality was being challenged before the Supreme Court. He remained for thirteen months before going to work for Francis B. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State for Political Affairs, whose primary responsibility was for the Far East. When Sayre was named High Commissioner for the Philippines in 1939, Hiss became an Assistant to Stanley Hornbeck, State Department Advisor on Political Relations for the Far East. Here part of his job was to provide diplomatic support for China as it resisted the Japanese invasion. Much of the work involved developing and enforcing economic sanctions against Japan. Hiss also was charged with assessing the balance of power between Prime Minister Chiang Kai-Shek’s Nationalist forces and the Communist insurgency led by Mao Tse-Tung. Like many of his colleagues in the State Department, he became convinced that despite continuing American support Chiang Kai-Shek could not survive the communist insurgency.

By the spring of 1944, Hiss was becoming increasingly involved in the post-World War II planning efforts that were being concentrated in the State Department. From August through October he served as Secretary of the Dumbarton Oaks Conference, more formally known as the Washington Conversations on International Peace and Security Organization. The Dumbarton Oaks meetings were chaired by Deputy Secretary of State, Edward Reilly Stettinius, to whom Alger Hiss reported. It was here that the idea for the United Nations was formally adopted by the allies. In February 1945 Hiss was asked by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to join the American delegation at the Yalta Conference. This was the key war-time meeting of the heads of the governments of the United States (President Franklin D. Roosevelt), United Kingdom (Prime Minister Winston Churchill), and the Soviet Union (General Secretary Joseph Stalin) that formulated the plan for the post-war reorganization of Europe. Upon returning home, Hiss was named Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on International Organizations. He presided over the United Nations Conference on International Organizations in San Francisco that was held from April 25 to June 26 1945 and drafted of the United Nations charter. Fifty nations participated in the conference at the invitation of the sponsoring governments: the United States, the United Kingdom, the USSR, and China.

In January 1946, Hiss attended the first meeting of the U.N. in London as an advisor to the American delegation. In February 1947, he resigned from the State Department to become president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Scope and Contents Note:

The Alger Hiss Papers reproduced in this microfilm publication are from the State Department’s Office of Special Political Affairs. For the most part, they document the post-war planning process, Alger Hiss’ role, and work on the Dumbarton Oaks and United Nations conferences. The papers are organized as subject files. They include memoranda addressed to Hiss, occasional responses, correspondence, and associated reports. Much of the correspondence in this series consists of letters and reports that Alger Hiss was copied on. This record group provides excellent documentation about U.S. politics and policy as they related to the war, post-war planning, and the founding of the United Nations.

These records are divided into eight series:

- Subject files of the Office of Special Political Affairs
- Records Relating to Dumbarton Oaks
- United Nations Conference on International Organization, Files of Alger Hiss
- UNICO Subject Files of John G. Ross (member of the State Department’s post-war planning advisory group)
- UNICO Subject Files Cabot Coville (special assistant to Secretary of State Cordell Hull and Japanese expert)
- UNICO Subject files of C. Easton Rothwell (advisor to Cordell Hull and Asian expert at the Dumbarton Oaks conference)
- Records Relating to the UN Preparatory Commission
- Records Relating to Post-War Reparations and Property Rights

These files describe the post-war planning process undertaken by the State Department in late 1943. They document the process by which the United Nations was created, beginning at the Dumbarton Oaks conference in 1944 and culminating in the San Francisco conference two years later, with an emphasis on Alger Hiss’ role as first Secretary General of the United Nations.
The records outline the process through which President Roosevelt concentrated post-war planning within the State Department and the work Alger Hiss and other mid-level diplomats did in developing and implementing an American policy that envisioned the U.N. as playing a central role as a force for peace, and stability. These files show that President Roosevelt and policy makers at the State Department understood that Woodrow Wilson had failed to make a convincing argument for continuing American internationalism and support for the League of Nations during and after World War I. This historical memory defined the Roosevelt administration’s strategy for building public support for the United Nations. Much of this record group describes the ways in which American diplomats sought to shape and monitor public opinion in order to establish support for an internationalist foreign policy and the United Nations in the years between 1943 and 1945. This was Alger Hiss’ primary responsibility in the Office of Special Political Affairs. His work was to articulate and build support for the United States’ political and economic goals, war aims, and the administration’s vision for the post-war world.

The records document meetings attended by representatives of the United States, the Soviet Union, Great Britain, France, and China where the major subject of discussion was the structure and form of the proposed United Nations. Correspondence and reports describe the deliberations during which small and medium-sized nations succeeded in restricting the Big Five’s use of the veto in the Security Council. The Dumbarton Oaks draft of the charter had given the Security Council almost unlimited power, but at the U.N. meetings there was substantial opposition to this approach. Another major subject of negotiations was the proposals largely sponsored by the Soviet Union and Asian and African liberation movements to assure that the U.N. was given substantive responsibility for social, economic, and colonial matters. There was considerable debate about the role of the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council, which at the end were given much wider authority than had been envisioned at Dumbarton Oaks. Alger Hiss as Deputy Director of the State Department’s Office of Special Political Affairs often found himself mediating between Great Britain and the Soviet Union in order to resolve differences over colonial policy and the role of the Security Council. Great Britain was seeking to continue its control over its empire, while the Soviet Union was pushing for rapid decolonialization. Throughout, the Roosevelt administration balanced its strategic objectives and its visions of a post-war world in which the U.S. would be a dominant power, with the interests of its wartime allies. Hiss was involved in this process, but his primary mission was to manage the domestic aspects of foreign policy and diplomacy.

These files describe efforts to build a political consensus around an internationalist foreign policy and the United Nations in ways that would assure support of business, labor, political advocacy groups, and the press. Alger Hiss and the State Department viewed Walter Lippmann, the famed columnist for the New York Herald Tribune, as being a particularly important figure in shaping public ideas about American foreign policy. Hiss spent a good deal of effort trying to persuade an often skeptical Lippmann to support the foreign policy objectives of the Roosevelt administration. The files show that Hiss was often frustrated by Lippmann’s critique of the proposed United Nations, which the journalist saw as part of a somewhat naïve effort to bring the New Deal reform agenda to the world stage.

There is also substantial documentation on the campaign to convince key Republican leaders, most notably Michigan’s Senator Arthur Vandenberg, to support the Roosevelt administration’s war aims and diplomatic agenda. The records describe the critical role that Vandenberg played within the Republican Party as he sought to build support for a bi-partisan foreign policy and the United Nations. Hiss also worked with the Democratic Speaker of the House of Representatives, Sam Rayburn, in order to assure that the Democratic Party would be unified in its support for the U.N. As part of this effort he held discussions with numerous national leaders representing civil rights organizations, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, peace groups, women’s rights groups, agricultural interests, manufacturers that were involved in international trade, and, of course, the press.

While Hiss was managing the public aspects of wartime diplomacy he was also increasingly involved in discussions concerning the organization of the U.N. Conference. The records clarify the relationship between diplomatic strategy and the structuring of the conference. As it was organized, the plenary session was the highest authority and responsible for the final votes and the adoption of the charter. Under the plenary were four general committees: the Steering Committee, the Executive Committee, the Coordination Committee, and the Credentials Committee. Here the United States had the dominant voice, with Great Britain the Soviet Union also playing key, but somewhat secondary roles. On the next level, which had wider international representation, there were the commissions that developed policy proposals about the authority of the Security Council, General Assembly, and international judicial organizations. The Secretariat, under Alger Hiss’ leadership, provided general administrative support for the conference. It also prepared agendas, working papers, compiled minutes of key meetings, and developed the administrative structure that would define the responsibilities of U.N. staff. Hiss coordinated the work of both the committees and commissions in ways that assured that most decisions were in line with American interests. More than 5,000 proposals addressing key aspects of international relations were considered at the conference. The Office of Political Affairs organized them into the following categories:

- Plans for post-war Germany, the economic impact of its defeat, demilitarization, the shape of allied military government, Soviet, French, and British interests, and discussions about Henry Morgenthau’s plan for German demilitarization and economic partition;
- Decolonialization and its impact on Europe, Asia, and Latin America, trusteeships, and post-war international organization;
- The Soviet Union in Eastern Europe as defined by the Yalta conference; efforts by the United States to mediate differences between Great Britain, and the USSR;
- Discussions relating to the proposed International Labor Organization;
- Bi-lateral and multi-national negotiations relating to regional agreements in Latin America and Asia;
- Draft reports relating to armaments;
- Sino-Russian relations;
- Post-war and regional security arrangements;
- Insurgency and counter insurgency movements in Greece, Italy, and Asia (particularly China, Korea, and Indochina);
- Arab/Jewish relations and Palestine;
- Human rights;
- Foreign trade, access to raw materials, free trade policies, establishment of post-war international currency systems, and the world trade organization.

Taken together, these records provide rich documentation about American foreign policy as it developed at in the last years of the Second World War. They describe the ways in which World War II redefined the diplomatic, economic, and political order in Europe, the Far East, and much of the rest of the world as the United States became the dominant power. There are hints of the developing East/West and North/South conflicts over Eastern Europe, Asia, the end of colonialism, and the upsurge of revolutionary nationalism that would soon erupt into the Cold War. What is most interesting is the ways in which the Roosevelt administration successfully worked to minimize these divides and was largely successful in keeping the focus on the war effort until allied victory was assured. However, these records highlight the many international and regional conflicts that would frame the ensuing half-century of geopolitical and ideological struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union.

SUBJECT INDEX

The first number after each entry refers to the reel, while the number following the colon refers to a folder number on that reel. Hence 6:106 directs the researcher to folder 106 of reel 6. These subjects will not necessarily be found at the beginning of the designated folder, but will be located within it. This Subject Index is best used in conjunction with the Reel Index, which lists not only folder numbers, but folder titles as well.
