Census Data with Maps for Small Areas of New York City, 1910–1960

This unique collection provides the census for each level of geography, often accompanied by a map specifying and illustrating each small area's boundaries. Each census series includes the questionnaire that was used to derive the data and maps detailing the small area enumerated in the tables that follow, along with any explanatory text accompanying the original tables. A guide, Census Data with Maps for Small Areas of New York City, 1910–1960: A Guide to the Microfilm, is provided with orders for the collection.

Their emphasis on ordinary people and the commonplace event make them important in the study of American history and culture. In addition, researchers can learn much about day-to-day life through analysis of information on churches, public and private schools, benevolent, literary and other associations, and banks.

First Three Centuries of Appalachian Travel

Before the American Revolution, most Americans and Europeans knew little about Appalachia — the vast region between Lexington, Kentucky and Winchester, Virginia, from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania to Birmingham, Alabama — and even regarded it as a myth. The First Three Centuries of Appalachian Travel is based on diaries and narration of explorers, cartographers, military men and travelers. Their accounts provide a view of the region, which spans three centuries and provides information on the social, political, economic, scientific, religious and agricultural characteristics of the area. A printed guide is also available.

London Directories from the Guildhall Library, 1677-1799

The bibliography London Directories 1677-1799, published in 1932 by Charles W. F. Goss, was the starting point for this widely used collection. Goss compiled and annotated the London Directories, highlighting names of interesting personalities and abstracting bits of history from between the lines. The information held by the directories documents the growth of London over a span of three centuries, chronicling the city's evolution through the listing of streets, individuals, trades and other information.

The Making of Modern London

This series offers a lively and detailed record of London and its people over two centuries, compiled by the city's most important officials. The Repertories of the Court of Aldermen and The Common Council's responsibilities included law and order, trade, education, religious conformity, building, food prices, social problems and almost every issue affecting the life of Londoners. Crucial to historians of London and central to any study of urban history, the Repertories illustrate all the issues facing one of the most prominent urban societies before and after the Industrial Revolution.

Ordnance Surveyors' Drawings, 1789–1840

A unique and neglected cartographic source of the late 18th and early 19th centuries, this collection is a repository of original topographical information, much of it not reproduced in the printed editions. The original manuscript maps of the first Ordnance Survey present the only accurate and comprehensive cartographic record of Britain before the changes in land use and land tenure, which followed the General Enclosures Acts. Although a small number of original manuscript maps are no longer available for reproduction, the great majority — 351, covering all but the six northernmost counties — are included in their entirety.
